Fight Like A Geisha. This was the title of the demonstration I went to last night at the flagship store in New York. It was not a boxing demonstration. I was expecting that sort of thing, at the Regent's Theater in London some years ago, where I witnessed a demonstration in which the 'contestants' fought bare-knuckle using the head as a weapon. No, this was a demonstration of what kind of kickboxing a female might possess, the technique and style demonstrated during the demonstration being a mix of light to non-contact combat and artistry. The instructor, a man in a kimono, kicked a circular object, a bell, around the room, which people could try to hit. Rather than the traditional 'jab-jab' that we're used to, kickboxing moves seem to resemble balletic stepping motions. The teacher demonstrated a twist kick, a movement in which a rear leg to the side is stepped high, twisting the torso, and then the foot is brought down hard. (Another example of skillful footwork occurred in the spectacular image at the top of this post.) Most striking was the fact that the teacher, who was of the same gender as the people practicing the moves, didn't seem to show any more concern about the 'performance' than a male teacher might. His control of the classes was masterful and his instruction was given with skill and aplomb. It should come as no surprise to find that the Grand Hyatt Hotel, where the event was held, is one of the 'martial arts' places in New York City. There is a 'personal training' gym on the first floor and a Krav Maga and kickboxing class in a large room. We also saw a boxing ring on the seventh floor, which is meant for sessions with a more advanced person and is reserved for the Krav Maga classes. As well as giving us a sort of karate demonstration, it was fascinating to see a demonstration of the advantage of a '570a42141b
