Neurological damage resulting from subarachnoid hemorrhage is a major cause of morbidity and mortality after aneurysmal subarachnoid hemorrhage. Clinical prognostic factors for this devastating complication are believed to be effective neuroprotective therapies. Data collection that produces objective measures of brain injury is essential to the research activity that seeks to improve the care of these patients. For example, brain volume changes associated with aneurysm formation or as a result of primary cerebral vasospasm may be used to estimate the severity of aneurysmal cerebral vasospasm. Many clinical studies have been performed in patients to investigate neurological prognostic factors and their potential clinical impact, but because of ethical and practical considerations, these studies have been limited to patient populations and limited in the number of variables investigated.
